BOX BRINGS YOUTH TO CRASH GATES

Charles Loeb Rides in a Packing Case From Chicago To Los Angeles—Comes Out Ready for Location

HOLLYWOOD, June 3. (LP)—Those who want to crash the gates of Hollywood's motion picture studios might try Charles Loeb's method of making a trip from Chicago to Los Angeles in an express car, nailed up in a wooden box and labeled "Statue—Handle with Care—Value $500."

Loeb, 28-year-old German youth, survived such a jaunt and while he is in the Culver City jail today he apparently is going to get his long sought chance in the films when he gets out.

Wrong Place

Loeb's mistake came when he thought he had made the whole trip and was in the Pathe Studio and shouted "Hey, you, out there," to attract attention. When the box was opened he discovered that he was still in an express room at Culver City.

When the box was opened out fell Loeb, clothed for business. He wore a stiff collar, checkered trousers, soft-soled dancing shoes, a derby hat, a flowing tie and his cheeks were rouged and his eyes painted. He was ready for the show but found a policeman.

His crate had all the comforts of a home. There was a mirror at the head of the box and a make-up case.
